Current Research:

Emotion, social cognition, cross-cultural psychology:

Testing and refining a theory of the appraisal determinants of emotions

Applying the theory to account for cultural, developmental, and individual differences in emotional response

Investigating differences and similarities among particular emotions in phenomenology, physiology, expressions, action tendencies, actions, goals, and response “strategies”

Examining relationships among particular emotions (including emotion families, and the system of emotional response alternatives)

Relating emotion-eliciting appraisals to emotional responses, within an overarching model of the emotion system

Studying how people attempt to regulate emotions using cognitive, motivational, and behavioral strategies; and comparing the efficacy of different regulatory mechanisms

Applying basic research on appraisals and emotions to help understand, diagnose, and treat emotional pathology

Motivation:

Examining relationships between motivation and emotion, and their distinct and complementary contributions to the explanation of behavior

Testing and refining a theory of romantic, vocational, political, and religious passion

Political psychology, belief systems:

Testing and refining theories of ideological structure and individual attachment to ideologies; identifying factors that produce belief systems resistant to disconfirmation
